ABSTRACT

ICT has proved to be something of a Trojan Horse in the way that it is forcing us to look again at the design of the curriculum, of assessments and of buildings. To meet both children's sense of entitlement to and the economy's need for creative, agile minds is tough, but it is being made tougher by the fact that there are now more scoundrels in e-learning than in used car sales. This presentation examines some of the choices we now all face.
